New Process For Making Iron at Ford Company

saves both time and money, has been discovered at the Ford Motor Company plant at Detroit. Fine gray and malleable irons are now made direct from the ore at one process of melting, instead of being put through two sets of melting pots. This, of course, permits quicker use of the ore and saves an enormous amount of expensive heat

Iron and steel products are divided. roughly, into three classes, gray iron, malleable iron and steel. Gray iron is used in parts where flexibility is not required, for cylinders and machinery construction in general. Mal-leable iron is used where a light degree of flexibility is required and steel where strength, flexibility and bardness are necessary.

Hitherto, only steel could be made excursion ticket to Spokane, Washing directly from blast furnace iron, or ton. There I found work on a ranch molten ore, and then only when the I was so weak, and had not worked Bessemer or duplex process was used. But by the new Ford process iron ore days seemed as if they would never can be melted directly into either gray end. By and by my strength and iron or malleable iron.

The carbon maganese, silicon, phosphorus and sulphur in the ore, which formerly were insurmountable obcess, are eliminated or reduced in a berta, Canada, line. in a manner that has not been made public, as it is not likely to be soon, for the Ford plant is saving thousands of dollars daily. About 700 tons of stay and malleable iron are used
